ADDITIONAL SUPPLEMENT TO THE BOMBAY COU

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1825.

destructible part called Luz, which is the seed from whence it is to be reproduced. It is described as a bone, in shape like an almond, and having its place at the end of the vertebræ; and truly this is not more absurd than the hypothesis which assigned the pineal gland for the seat of the soul. This bone, according to the Rabbis, can neither be broken by any force of man, nor consumed by fire, nor dissolved by water; and they tell us that the fact was proved before the Emperor Adrian, upon whom they imprecate their usual malediction, "May his bones be broken!" In his presence Rabbi Joshua Ben Chacma produced a Luz; it was ground between two mill-stones but came out as whole as it had been put in; they burnt it with fire and it was found incombustible; they cast it in water, and it could not be softened; lastly, they hammered it upon an anvil, and both the anvil and hammer were broken without affecting the Luz. The Rabbinical writers, with their wonted perversion of Scripture, support this silly notion by a verse from the Psalms: 'He keepeth all his bones, so that not one of them is broken.' A dew is to descend upon the earth preparatory to the resurrection, and quicken into life and growth these seeds of the dead. During the pontificate of Urban VIII., a large burial-ground of the Jews at Rome was broken up to make room for some new fortifications, and the Jews were particularly anxious to collect all the bones, paying the labourers a dear price of them. But not a single specimen of the Luz could they produce to their enemy Bartolocci when he called for it upon so favourable an opportunity. Another curious opinion is, that wherever their bodies may be buried, it is only in their own promised land that the resurrection can take place, and therefore they who are interred in any other part of the world must make their way to Palestine under ground, and this will be an operation of dreadful toil and pain, although clefts and caverns will be opened for them by the Almighty. It has been gravely objected to this notion, that although the bodies of the Just after the resurrection, will according to the opinion of St. Thomas Aquinas, be endued with agility and penetrability, which would enable them to pass through any distance in the twinkling of an eye, and through any substance without experiencing resistance, yet this cannot be predicated of the Jews, whose bodies, they being to rise only for condemnation, will be gross and feculent—Whether it arose from this superstition, or from that love for the land of their fathers which in the Jews is connected with the strongest feeling of faith and hope, certain it is, that many have directed their remains to be sent there. 'We were fraughted with wool,' says an old traveller, 'from Constantinople to Sidon, in which sacks, as most certainly was told to me, were many Jews' bones put into little chests, but unknown to any of the ship. The Jews, our merchants, told me of them at my return from Jerusalem to Saphet, but earnestly entreated me not to tell it, for fear of preventing them another time.' Sometimes a wealthy Jew has been known to import earth from Jerusalem wherewith to line his grave. This is a point of feeling, not of superstition; but superstition has made the Italians, in old times, import earth from the same country for whole churchyards.—Lambeth and the Vatican.

Chancery Etiquette.—Under the Lord Chancellor, there are twelve subordinate judges called Masters in Chancery. When an account is to be taken before them the following is the mode of procedure:—The attornies on the one side and the other ought to appear before the master, either alone or in company, with counsel, as may be convenient. First summons; nobody appears. Second summons; nobody appears. At length, third summons, the parties appear, and the matter is put into train. Care, however, has been taken to allow only half an hour, or an hour to each set of suitors. The parties are not always punctual; the matter is begun, the clock strikes, and then the matter is dismissed. At the following hearing it is necessary to begin again. All this is matter of etiquette. At each summons, the fees to the judges and the counsel are renewed. All the world must live. Extortion, it is said, is to be banished from the dwellings of finance. At some future day, perhaps, it will not be found befitting guest for the Temple of Justice—it will be deemed advisable to chase it thence.—Bentham.

THE MORNING HERALD.—June 9.

BOW-STREET.

John Price, the landlord of the Cross Keys public-house in Whitcomb-street, appeared, upon summons, before G. R. Minshull, Esq yesterday, to answer the complaint of John Francis Panchaud, a foreigner, who accused the said landlord with having conspired, with other gentlemen unknown, to deprive him of 10*l.* bank note, at Ascot Races on Thursday last.

In order to a better understanding of this and for the benefit of the greener liege of our Sovereign Lord the King, it may be a well to premise that all races, fairs, and other such-like conglomerations of those whom Heaven has blessed with more money than wit, are frequented by many minor members of "The Fancy," who are technically called flat-catchers, and who pick up a very pretty living by means of a quick hand, a rattling tongue, a deal board, three thimbles, and a pepper-corn. The game they play with these curious articles,—is a sort of Lilliputian game at cups and balls; and the beauty of it lies in dexterously seeming to place the pepper-corn under one particular thimble, getting a green one to bet that it is there, and then winning his money by showing that it is not. Every operator at this game is attended by certain of his friends called eggers and bonnetters—the eggers to egg on the green ones to bet, by betting themselves; and the bonnetters, to bonnet any green one who may happen to win—that is to say knock his hat over his eyes, whilst the operator and the others bolt with the stakes. And this pretty little game they call "the thimble rig;" and it was by venturing a trifle upon this game that Mousieur Jean Francois Panchaud lost his 10*l.* note.

On Thursday, last, as aforesaid, M. Panchaud was at Ascot races, and he there saw this landlord defendant, and several other gentlemen, betting away, and apparently winning "lots of sovereigns" at one of these same thimble and peppercorn boards. "Try your luck, gentlemen!" cried the operator; "I'll bet any gentlemen any thing, from a half a crown to five sovereigns, that he doesn't name the thimble as covers the corn!" M. Panchaud betted half a crown,—won it;—betted a sovereign—won it;—betted a second sovereign—lost it. "Try your luck, gentlemen!" cried the operator again—shifting his thimbles and peppercorn about the board here and there and everywhere in a moment; and this done, he offered M. Panchaud a bet of five sovereigns that he could not "name the thimble what covered the corn." Bet him!—bet him!—why don't you bet him?" said the landlord defendant—nudging M. Panchaud on the elbow; and M. Panchaud, convinced in his "own breast" that he knew the right thimble, said, "I shall betta you five sovereign if you will not tutch the thimbles again till I name "Done!" cried the operator; and M. Panchaud was done—for laying down his 10*l.* note it was caught up by somebody, the board was upset, the operator and his friends vanished "like a flash of lightning," and M. Panchaud was left, full of amazement, but with empty pockets, and the landlord defendant standing by his side. "They're a set of rascals!" said the landlord defendant; "but don't fret my fine fellow! I'll take you to somebody that shall soon get your money again;" and so saying, he boldly led him towards the Royal stand, where he introduced him to Bishop and J. J. Smith, the police officers, as a gentleman who had been very ill-used; at the same time telling them that he had no doubt he could point out the cheats. The affair was immediately mentioned to Sir Richard Birnie; and by his direction, Smith accompanied the landlord defendant round the Heath in search of the said cheats; but he did not meet with any that he thought proper to point out. During this perambulation, he admitted to Smith that he had betted at the game at some particular table in order to induce others to bet, but that he had nothing to do with the one in question. It was afterwards ascertained, however, that he had been seen betting as a decoy at this same table, repeatedly, in the course of the day; and it being known that the house he keeps in Whitcomb-street is the resort of thieves and cheats of every kind, the present proceeding was instituted against him, as a particeps criminis in the robbery of M. Panchaud.

In his defence he denied that he had ever admitted betting at any game of the kind; and he appealed to M. Panchaud whether he had not manifested the greatest regret at his loss; and whether he did not take him directly to the officers in the hope of recovering his property.

"Oh! yes," replied M. Panchaud—"you took me the wrong way! The thieves ran one way, and you took me the other, you know. Ahah!—you know what you are about—you took me the wrong way—Ahah!"

The landlord defendant, stoutly protested his innocence; and an old man, a friend of his, gave him an excellent character; but, maugre all his protestations and the advocacy of his ancient friend, the Magistrate held that there was quite sufficient evidence to detain him, and he was detained accordingly.

COTTON WOOL.

The importation this year of cotton wool into the United Kingdom amounts to 337,000 bags, which is at the rate of 15,000 bags a week.

The importation up to the same period last year was 261,000 bags, which was at the rate of 12,000 bags a week.

The excess of import this year over last year has been 76,000 bags, which is at the rate of 3,000 bags import this year over that of last year.

And yet, though there has been imported this year so much more than last year, the price this year is 100 per cent. higher than it was at this period last year.

We should like to know how Daniel Hardcastle would account for this increased supply being accompanied with such an increase of price.—Will Daniel demonstrate that an increased quantity of medium has been the cause of so singular a phenomenon?

ORIGIN OF THE EARLDOM OF STIRLING.

Sir William Alexander, of Menstrie, (in Scotland), Knight, an eminent person in his time, was, in 1625, created Premier Baronet of Nova Scotia, on the first institution of that Order; in 1630 he was created Lord Alexander of Tullibodie, and Viscount of Stirling, to him and his heirs male, bearing the name and arms of Alexander. In 1633 he was advanced to the dignity of Earl of Stirling, and Viscount Canada, with the like limitations. But a few years afterwards, having lost his eldest and two other sons, and witnessing the declining health of his surviving sons, and fearing that in the event of failure of the heirs male of his own body, his honours might devolve upon distant collaterals, he made a surrender of his titles to the King (according to the custom of the law of Scotland), and on the 7th of December, 1639, obtained a charter of novo-damus, whereby the foresaid titles were relimited, and specially entailed, upon failure of heirs male of the Earl's body, to descend to the eldest heirs female, and their issue male respectively, who should be the next heir female to the last heir male succeeding to the dignities granted.—Under this limitation, upon the death of the fifth Earl of Stirling in 1739, without issue the family honours descended upon the issue male of the fourth son of the first Earl, namely, to John, his grandson, who was a Presbyterian Minister of the Established Church of Scotland then residing in Dublin. He deceased very shortly afterwards, leaving two sons and two daughters, all in early minority. The two sons died very young men, without issue, whereby the two sisters, Mary and Hannah, became coheiresses, but as the honours were to go to the eldest heir female without division, the former was entitled to them, and died unmarried in 1794; whereby her only surviving sister, Hannah, became sole heiress to the Earldom, &c. This Lady married Wm. Humphrys, Esq. of the Larches, in the county of Warwick, and died at Worcester in 1814, leaving Alexander Humphrys, Esq. (by courtesy Viscount Canada) her only son and heir, who has taken the surname of Alexander, pursuant to the restrictive clause of charter of novo-damus, by virtue of his Majesty's royal license and authority, dated Carlton House, March 8, 1824.

HAMPSHIRE TELEGRAPH AND SUSSEX CHRONICLE—June 13.

Singular Hydrophobia Experiment—We have stated that a dog, supposed to be rabid, had bitten Mr. White Surgeon, of Brighton, and five other persons, and that Mr W. had taken no precaution in respect to the severe bite he had received in the arm, from a conviction of the non-communicability of rabies to the human subject. The dog died in the course of the night of Friday se'nnight. The following is Mr. White's account:—"In the morning (Saturday) I entered her place of confinement. I there found three basins of water (one of which, each day, had been placed there) untouched. The contents of three dishes of food, two had not much decreased, though she had evidently eaten of them. It was manifest that she had not drank water for nearly three days: indeed she had, from the first, betrayed a disinclination to it—but not amounting to dread. She would move back from that fluid if gently pushed towards her: this was tried in basins of different colours—brown and white. It was not so with food, for she would eat of that before me.—On Saturday afternoon, I was favoured by a call from Dr. King, Dr. Martin, and Mr. Sutton, to notice any appearances that might present themselves on examining the body of the dog. Such appearances are included in the following account:—The liver was of a good size, and apparently healthy. The heart rather large, and, like the neighbouring vessels, gorged with blood. The stomach was nearly empty, and bore the strongest marks of inflammatory action on its under coat and general substance. The intestines, through all their convolutions, were much thickened and marked by the same unequivocal appearances of excitement from some cause. There were about twenty live worms in the ileum (the longest of the small intestines.)—The lungs, on being inflated, were (with the exception of marks of inflammation) without disease: but the stomach being submitted to distension, the air was found not to pass, from the thickened state of its pyloric (lower) orifice, into the intesti

…e those serious intensity of her Juliet, the con-
…gal purity of her Imogen, and the noble ten-
…erness of her Desdemona, are fitly celebrated
…d as far as possible, described. In the last
…Mr. Boaden gives an instance of her feeling and power which seems to us one of the very highest triumphs of the scenic art.

"The second scene of the third act had a beauty of expression in the countenance that offered one of the most striking and variable pictures ever contemplated; it was where Othello, holding her hand exclaims—

> This hand of your's requires
> A sequester from liberty, fasting and prayer,
> Much castigation, exercise devout;
> For here's a young and sweating devil here
> That commonly rebels.

"The surprise arising to astonishment, a sort of doubt if she heard aright, and, that being admitted, what it could mean, a hope that it would end in nothing so unusual from him as an offensive meaning and the slight relief upon Othello's adding, 'Tis a good hand, a frank one'---all this commentary was quite as legible as the text."

To us who recollect this astonishing woman only in her later days, it is difficult to imagine her in Rosalind; but our author assures us that the feminine sweetness and delicacy with which she performed the part, more than compensated the audience for the absence of rude and boisterous mirth. Nothing could exceed the beauty of her first address to Orlando after the wrestling---"My pride fell with my fortunes;" or the modest tenderness with which she gave the line---"And overthrown more than your enemies." The ladies and gentlemen of the green-room who, at the present day, hold it a point of honour to insist on performing none but first-rate parts, will think her strangely remiss in asserting her dignity, when they find her, in the very bloom of her popularity, playing the Queen in Richard the Third, and Mrs. Lovemore in The Way to keep Him. To us, however, these condescensions, not offered nor felt as such, but freely rendered as tributes to her art, serve only to show a noble confidence in her own fame, and a disdain of the littleness of envy. They relieve delightfully that magnificent series of triumphs which are recorded in these pages—the maternal dignity and love of her Lady Randolph—the rage and agony of her Zara—the majestic sorrow of her Constance—the moral grandeur of her Isabella, in Measure for Measure—the delicate bewilderment and glimmering sense of her Ophelia—the triumphant heroism of her Euphrasia---the meek suffering of her Shore---the towering passion of her Alicia---the repentant grace of her Mrs. Haller---the regal sublimity of her Lady Macbeth, and her Volumnia, in which the true genius of old Rome seemed embodied in the form of woman.

Mr. Kemble, as his biographer unreservedly acknowledges, did not, like his sister, burst on the town in the full maturity of his powers. He was a gentleman and a scholar, with signal advantages of person, and with almost equal defects of voice, who determined to become a noble actor, and who succeeded by infinite perseverance and care, assisted doubtless by the reputation and the influence of Mrs. Siddons. He formed a high standard in his own mind, and gradually rose to its level. At his very last, in all characters which were within the scope of his physical capacity, he played his best, and that best seemed absolute perfection. His career, therefore, may be reviewed with that calm and increasing pleasure, with which we contemplate the progressive advances of art; instead of the feverish admiration and disappointment which are alternately excited by the history of those who have played from impulse in the first vigour of youth, and in after-days have been compelled languidly to retrace the vestiges of their early genius. At first he had but a limited choice of characters; he was opposed by Henderson, to whom he was then unequal, and rivalled by Smith, who held possession of the chief parts in tragedy as well as comedy till he left the stage. For a long time, Holman and even Pope divided public favour with him; but the seeds of greatness were deeply implanted in his nature, and the determination to cultivate and mature them. Even after he became manager and obtained an uneasy and invidious power, there were not wanting accidents to retard his progress. Cooke, in spite of his imprudencies, perhaps by the aid of some of them, beat him on his stage in the estimation of the vulgar; Master Betty obscured him for a season; and the O. P. disturbance, ungenerously begun by the people, and imprudently resisted by the managers, set him in painful opposition to the town, and fretted the haughty spirit which it could not subdue. But resolution prevailed; he went on calmly studying the principles of his art, and succeeded at last in presenting the stateliest pictures of Roman greatness, and giving the most appropriate expression to philosophic thought that it had entered into modern imagination to conceive.

It has been of late the fashion to charge the style of Mr. Kemble as deficient in nature, and to extol certain occasional familiarities of manner in his rivals as characteristic of a better and purer school. A great deal of the controversy on this subject has arisen from confusion of terms. An exact imitation of life can never be reasonably demanded of an artist who is bound to represent the growth and contest of the passions in a few short scenes, and who is to speak blank verse. Tragedy is not a piece cut at random out of the great succession of human affairs, but an epitome, or condensed expression of passion and suffering, in which individuals represent whole classes, in which the progress of time is hastened and consequences are forestalled, and in which agony and death itself are glorified and rendered sacred. It has no room for the petty trifling of common existence, and must be realized not to the vulgar sense by assimilation to ordinary habits, but by its fitness to the imagination, and the feeling of moral grandeur. It is true, Mr. Kemble did not succeed in representing the immediate contest of opposing passions; but his acting was noblest when most simple, and most effective when it was retrospective in its tone. He could not pourtray the ecstasies of love, but he could admirably exhibit affection mellowed by time; he did not give the fury of disappointment, but the depth of settled despair; his acting reflected times past, and his mind seemed to brood over the relics of greatness and joy---"a noble wreck in ruinous perfection!" Were the softenings of the recluse in Penruddock, when the son of the mistress of his youth revived her image; or the heart-broken tones of his Stranger; or the pensive retrospection of his Macbeth "fallen into the sere and yellow leaf;" or the meditative gentleness of his Hamlet, when his voice floated over the grave "the still sad music of humanity," less natural than the sudden changes of attitude and jerks of voice admired in others? To assert that his "Cato," his "Coriolanus," and his "Brutus" were not natural, by way of censure, is to sneer at the whole world of classical associations as valueless.

The benefits which Mr. Kemble conferred on his art, by the introduction of appropriate scenery and costume, are traced out in these volumes with a minuteness which we cannot follow. Of the general result there can be no doubt, or of the great addition which it has made to our pleasures. Independent of the physical enjoyment thus conferred on the spectator; and the harmony produced in the scenic representation, the art itself was raised by the engagement of so much research, learning, and taste in its service. The dignity of the studies in which the manager was an adept, was infused into the gratifications of the audience, and gave an antique air to the gaieties of the age. Nor was the profession less indebted to his personal manners and demeanour, and to the conduct of all the members of his most respectable family. With a certain degree of formality and stiffness, which perhaps assisted in preserving entire his consistency in the dangerous sphere within which he was destined to move, there was a real sociality of disposition, which as it was independent of mere constitutional vivacity, was unimpaired by years. His studies gave a learned colouring to his discourse, which well became him. The kindness of his nature shone out in his performances on the stage; for he never failed to relieve the most repulsive of his parts with little touches of tenderness, as when he gazed with fond admiration on his daughter in Sir Giles Overreach, and dallied with the children in Richard. A certain grave humour enlivened his convivial hours, and occasionally lightened his performances in tragedy. In his youth, emulous of the versatility which was then expected even from veteran actors, he played comedy with fair success. It is hard to imagine him in Charles Surface or Ranger; but his Valentine was highly praised; and we doubt not that the wit and sense of Congreve, for which he had an obvious relish, were given by him with a brilliancy and neatness which made us for any want of constitutional gaiety and lightness.

Of the talents of Mr. Kemble as a writer we cannot speak highly; but such was his power of application, and such his general acuteness, that it is probable he would have excelled in any department of literary occupation to which he would devote his energy. There are several letters preserved by Mr. Boaden, written by him while travelling on the Continent, which shew considerable tact of observation, and which amply confirm all that his biographer has said of the warmth and rectitude of his social affections. The following letter is from Paris, addressed to his brother Charles, for whom he always felt the strongest regard.

"Paris, July 23 1820.

"My dear Charles,—How does my mother do? Is she in the country, or does she prefer staying in town? Tell me every thing about her health, and give my duty to her and to my father.

"After a circuit, Lille, Douai, and Arras, I arrived here safe and sound a few days ago. You know, perhaps, that we were detained a whole week at Lord Guildford's, who was inexpressibly kind to us, by poor Heathcote's illness. Every thing in Douai is in a state of ruin, poverty, and desolation not to be described. I had not the heart to go up to my old room. The neighbours, with whom I talked, have a notion that the English are coming back, and are overjoyed when they tell you so.

"This place (Paris) is such a scene of magnificence, filth, pleasure, poverty, gaiety, distress, virtue and vice, as constitutes a greater miracle than was ever chronicled in history. The plays I have seen are, Iphigenie en Aulide, by Racine; Oreste, by Voltaire; La Mere Coupable, by Beaumarchais; and a farce or two. I will not pretend to say any thing of the actors or the theatres, till I have seen a little more of them. Talma and I are grown very well acquainted; he seems an agreeable man. Last night I was presented to Comtat, who is not what she was. I know Michot, Fleury, Duzincourt, Baptiste, and one of two more of the Comedie Française, a little. I should have told you, that I have seen l'Abbé de l'Epée. Monvel acts the Abbé as well as possible; the other characters were very much inferior to the English. There cannot be a more kind reception than I met with here. My Lord Egremont, Lord and Lady Holland, who live most splendidly, insist on our dining with them every day, and with one or the other we do dine every day, and then you know comes the spectacle.

"I have promised Talma to procure a copy of Pizarro, that he may see whether it can be adapted to the French stage. Buy a book of it, make it up in separate packets, and send it me by the next post. I am afraid they will not be able to turn it to any use. Texier told me he would give me a letter or two to some person of his acquaintance here, who he thought might be useful and pleasant to a stranger. Pray upbraid him with having forgot me. He may send them still, if he pleases. God bless you, my boy! Don't forget to tell me how you do, and be sure to remember all the news. You are to direct to me, Hôtel de …ace de la Concorde, Pa… me to…y body I ought to…

"J. P. K…

The following is from Madrid.

"After wishing you many, many new y… happier than that which went before it, I will give… the satisfaction of knowing, that I am safe and well… here, after only two adventures on the way. I believe you know all the places I have seen a great deal better than I do; yet of Madrid will tell you, that it is a village to any one who has lived in London. A town that you may easily walk round in an hour and a half, and whose population does not probably exceed a hundred and fifty thousand souls, does not convey a very lofty idea of the metropolis of a great monarchy. Seen from some points, however, this village, as I have ventured to call it, is beautiful, and even magnificent. The old spires and towers of the convents and churches, the gay fronts of the public buildings, and the extensive mansions of the nobility, give it at once an air of gaiety and grandeur. I speak only of four or five particular streets; for the rest of them, in general, are too narrow for carriages to pass each other without danger; and they are latterly grown so dirty, that I wonder, considering the intolerable heat of their summers, that the plague is not as common here as at Constantinople.

"There are here two theatres. Senor Mayquez, who manages that called 'Los Caños del Peral' has been in France; he is an intelligent actor and certainly the best in the company. In this theatre they principally act translations of French comedies and vaudevilles. In the other, that called 'de la Cruz,' an actress who is styled La Senora Rita Luna, by her side and superior merit sustains the fame of the old and celebrated authors of Spain. The discernment and natural good taste of this lady show to her with exactness the idea of the character she has to represent. That acquaintance, from the amazing flexibility of her features, displays every thing that passes in her mind. The action of ordinary performers fails simply because they know not how to dispose of their lifeless frames: that of la Rita Luna adds the most speaking grace to a voice so musical, that, in Spanish expression, her mouth might be styled the shell of Apollo. In a word, I have only seen one actress to whom I think la Rita Luna inferior in the art. Highly distinguished as she is by Melpomene, la Rita Luna is yet more decidedly a favourite of Thalia; and she told me herself, that she never, with perfect good will, set herself about any tragic studies. But it is difficult to conceive how that can be done reluctantly which is so transcendent."

"You know what bustle they keep in England about the pride, pomp, and circumstance of a Spanish bull fight; by the best good luck in the world there has been one since I came to Madrid; it is exactly like all the rest of the exaggerated descriptions of too many travellers. I do assure you that it is a far from being a splendid or interesting spectacle, that if I lived in Spain for the rest of my life, I hardly believe I should have the least desire to see another.

"The King and Queen are expected to return to Aranjuez in the course of next week, when the greatest part of the immense train of the nobility, who have attended their Majesties in the country, will, it is supposed, be very well contented to come back to their own houses, & restore some spirit to Madrid, which, as they say here, is very dull for want of them. If they would bring some fire, as well as spirit, with them, I should be among the foremost to bid them welcome. Will you believe it? I am in what is called a very good lodging, and am at this present writing hereof absolutely freezing. What do you think of the month of January, and colder than it is in London, joined with a great square bare white washed room, and not a possibility of having grates of fire. There is hardly such a thing as a chimney in Madrid, and the pans of charcoal, over which the Spaniards crouch and cuddle themselves, to make so sick in ten minutes that I dare not go near them. There is no such thing as a window sash—but casements with in half a foot—and the frames escape so wide from all the doors, that you may almost walk into any apartment, without the trouble of opening them.

"Well, never mind all this. I like the Saniards very much, and shall be glad as long as I live, that I have seen them. The French have managed matters so as to be a good deal unpopular in Spain, the English, on the contrary, are in high favour; and would be received everywhere on a footing more easy and familiar even than they already are, were it not that the Spanish gentry are a little off of humour, and indeed, I must say, not unreasonably, with some of our countrymen, who after having been most hospitably admitted to their tables, parties, &c. have acted more like spies than liberal travellers, by ridiculing, in their publications, those manners and customs for the knowledge of which they were beholden to that GENEROSITY, which ought to have made its errors sacred from their mockery."

Of the general contents of these volumes, embracing the theatrical anecdotes of forty years, it is obviously impossible for us to convey any idea to our readers. They will find them entertaining, and peculiarly fit for desultory perusal, for they may be opened any where without injury to the effect, and laid down without even the trouble of marking the page where the reader pauses. They smack somewhat, we must confess, of age;—there is a little prosing, and an occasional feebleness; but these serve to give a sort of character to the book, which naturally belongs to a subject to which no young man could do justice. We are disposed to smile now and then at the importance attached to prologues and epilogues, which were never worthy of grave criticism, and have long been forgotten, and at the modest introduction of Mr. Boaden himself with dramas which no one but himself remembers. But, on the whole, the agreeable office has been well performed; and we seem as we read to listen to the unconstrained talk of an old lover of the drama, who recounts with enthusiasm the happy evenings of his life, and gives us vivid pictures of the great artists who have left us, and who can survive only in the descriptions of their early admirers.

Consistency---Mr. O'Connell's Opinion of the English Nation, in 1813.—"So dishonest and besotted a people as the English never lived! Shipping.—The Sir Edward Paget has not yet arrived, which is rather strange! but we suppose she must have been detained longer than was calculated upon at the Cape. The Commodore Hayes, Neptune, and Mary Anne may also be daily looked for.

We regret that it is still out of our power to give any account of the Lady Nugent.—She is greatly overdue, having sailed from the Channel, we believe, on the 13th of April, and we are consequently anxious to hear some tidings of her. Perhaps she touched at Rio, or the Cape.

The transport Malcolm is expected to be ready for sea about the 15th instant.

The Transports Golconda, William Money, and Argyle are preparing with all despatch to take over the 1st and 32d Regiments of Native Infantry, and the Detachments of Recruits and Volunteers for the different European Regiments serving in Ava—This reinforcement will consist altogether of nearly three thousand Men, and of upwards of that number if his Majesty's 45th Regiment go.

His Majesty's Ship Tamar returned to the Roads on sunday morning—She will proceed to join the Squadron in the Rangoon River in a day or two.

By Order of His Excellency the Commander in Chief. THOS. McMAHON, Col. A. G.

We have a letter from Arracan of the 9th instant, which gives a most gloomy account of the state of our troops. During the previous month upwards of 500 men died. It is with deep concern we learn that Mr. W. L. GRANT, the Superintending Surgeon of the Division, died on the 8th Instant of the prevailing fever. In him the service has lost a most zealous and able servant, and society a worthy, honorable, and kind hearted member. To dwell here longer upon his good qualities would be superfluous, for they are well known to the Government which he so devotedly served, and to the circle of friends, who now deplore his loss, no less than to the hundreds who bear in grateful recollection his never-ceasing professional kindness.

Although any tribute that may now be paid, comes too late to afford a particle of satisfaction to a bosom which no more throbs, however high its pulse once beat to the noblest feelings that can adorn the patriot and the soldier. Still is it satisfactory to find that the Hero who is now lost to us for ever is not forgotten, and that the efforts of those who wish to commemorate his virtues may excite others to emulate as much as circumstances may allow, the glorious career of him who was indeed an ornament and a pillar of strength to the Bengal Army, Sir DAVID OCHTERLONY.

Underneath is the requisition calling for a meeting which takes place this very day for the purpose of doing honor to his memory. We cannot help expressing our surprise that so few names are appended to the requisition. Certain we are that if it had received a more general circulation, many names would have appeared that are not now to be found in it. Apparently it was neither expected nor desired, that Subalterns should sign the requisition, at least no Subaltern's name is found subjoined to the requisition. It is natural then to conclude that the requisition was not sent to Subalterns, and that in short Subalterns were not invited to sign. We confess this rather surprises us, but as it is not our wish to dwell invidiously upon what may be an oversight, we hope that Subalterns as well as those of higher rank, upon this occasion, will come heartily and readily forward to evince their respect for the memory of him, who as we have said was indeed such a splendid ornament to the Bengal Army.

Calcutta, Sept. 19, 1825.

Proceedings held at a Meeting of the British Inhabitants of Calcutta, at the Town Hall, on Monday the 26th September, 1825.

In consequence of the notice published by the Sheriff of Calcutta, a general Meeting of the British Inhabitants was this day held at the Town Hall, for the purpose of considering the most appropriate means of testifying their high sense of the eminent public services, and their respect for the memory of the late Major-General Sir David Ochterlony, G. C. B., as a Soldier and a Statesman.

The Meeting having been opened by Wm. Macnaghten, Esq. the Sheriff in an appropriate speech, Brigadier O'Halloran moved, that Sir Charles Metcalf be requested to take the Chair, which motion was seconded by Alexander Gibb, Esq. and unanimously agreed to.

Sir Charles Metcalf having accordingly taken the Chair, he addressed the Meeting in substance, as follows:—

GENTLEMEN,—I am informed, that it is customary on such occasions as the present, to open the Proceedings of the Meeting by some preliminary observations from the Chair.—I shall not, however, I trust, be under the necessity of intruding much on your time. The Sheriff has done us the honor to announce the object of our assembling on which it cannot be necessary to dilate, in order to recommend it to your aptention. Who is there that does not admire the eminent public services of Sir David Ochterlony? Who is there that does not desire to pay respect to his Memory?

Distinguished in the highest degree, both in the Cabinet and in the Field, it may truly be said of him, that he was the pride of the Bengal Army, many of whose glorious achievments are connected with his renown; he was an honor to the whole Company's Service, which in every branch, loved his character, and exulted in his fame: and he was an ornament to the British community in India, which honored him in life, and deeply lamented him in death.

We are not met to commemorate his private virtues, but who that witnessed them can ever cease to dwell on them with mingled delight and regret? They shed around his public lustre the charm of fascination; and in addition to the enthusiasm excited by his exploits, drew towards him irresistibly and bound with indissoluble attachment, the hearts of all who knew him.

Never, perhaps, was there another so universelly admired as a Public Man, at the same time so generally and so fervently beloved. Never was there another more calculated to win affection, and when won, to preserve it for ever without diminution.

I will not detain you longer, Gentlemen, from hearing others better able to do justice to the subject; but before I sit down permit me to thank you for the honor you have conferred on me, by calling me to the Chair on this most interesting occasion. Sir David Ochterlony was to me one of the kindest and warmest of friends; and we co-operated for many years in the Public Service. I need not tell you how proud I was of his regard, nor what I feel in thinking, that that heart is now cold in the grave, which as long as it beat, was the throne of genuine benevolence, true honorable feeling, and cordial devotion to the interests of the State.

We will now, if you please, proceed to attend to such propositions as any of us may have to present, as to the most appropriate manner of testifying our high sense of the eminent public services, and our respect for the memory of our departed Hero Sir David Ochterlony.

Brigadier O'Halloran then rose and said, that as the Meeting of the British Inhabitants of Calcutta was convened for the purpose of testifying, by a last Memorial, the general sense entertained by them of the eminent public services of the late Major-General Sir David Ochterlony, whose great Military and Political career had associated his name with those illustrious characters, who have most eminently contributed to elevate the British name, and consolidate our empire in India; he moved that a Monument be erected by Public Subscription to that most distinguished Officer, in St. Paul's and a Column in the Capital of British India, which motion was seconded by W. B Bayley, Esq. and unanimously agreed to.

The following Resolutions were then severally proposed, duly seconded, and unanimously agreed to.

Moved by Alexander Gibb, Esq. and seconded by Lieut.-Col. Swiney:—That a Public Subscription be immediately opened for carrying into effect the preceding Resolution, and that a Paper do lie at the Town Hall for signatures.

Moved by Lieutenant Colonel Watson, and seconded by John Palmer, Esq.---That a Committee be also appointed for this purpose.

That the Committee do consist of the following Gentlemen:

Sir Charles Metcalf Bart., President.
Brigadier O'Halloran, C. B.
Lieutenant Colonel MacLeod, C. B.
H. Wood, Esq.
A. Colvin, Esq.
Lieutenant Colonel Bryant.

Lieutenant Colonel Casement, C. B.
Lieutenant Colonel Wood, C. B.
Captain Macan.
Major Lockett.
J. Grant, Esq.
Captain Armstrong.
Captain Hutchinson.

of whom any five form a Quorum.

Moved by John Palmer, Esq. and seconded by Lieutenant Colonel Bryant:---That Mr. Chantrey be invited to undertake the execution of the Monument proposed to be erected in St. Paul's.

It was also resolved that Mr. Palmer be requested to receive Subscriptions.

That in the absence of Sir Charles Metcalfe, in the Upper Provinces, Alexander Gibb, Esq. be nominated Vice-President.

That the Committee meet on Friday next, the 30th instant, at 10 o'clock, A. M. at the Town Hall.

That the thanks of the Meeting be given to Sir Charles Metcalfe, for the warm interest he has manifested in promoting the objects of this Meeting, and for his able conduct in the Chair.

That the thanks of the Meeting be given to the Sheriff.

The Meeting was then dissolved.

[The India Gazt. September 29.

The Thetis, from Rangoon the 2d September is said to be the bearer of important dispatches to Government. At the time when the Thetis sailed, the enemy were reported to be stockading themselves strongly along the banks of the Erawaddy near Prome; and their force estimated at 50,000 men, while another body also great in number was given out as advancing from Pegue on Rangoon. The state of perplexity, into which we are every now and then thrown by accounts from Ava, is sufficiently irksome; and on the present occasion the additional report, that Sir Archibald Campbell finds himself too weak to act on the offensive against the two Burman armies, but adds to this anxiety. We hope, however, that on the contents of the despatches becoming known, the present may only be another added to the long catalogue of vague and contradictiory tales, of which the Burmah Campaign has already been so prolific.

We believe it is in contemplation to relieve some of the corps, who have suffered most from sickness at Aracan. As the season will have arrived, when Aracan becomes healthy, before the relief can arrive, we may expect to find the troops fully effective for any service, in what they can be employed. The question is said still to remain problematical, how far the Aracan mountains are to present an impracticable barrier between our armies; and we should, for many obvious reason, be sorry to give up the hope, this barrier will still give way to our science and perseverance.

[John Bull, Sept. 29.

In our yesterday's paper we noticed the reports, received from Rangoon per the Thetis. In addition to the letters, which we had then seen, we have been favoured with the perusal of several others. It would appear, that a general opinion prevails that the Burmese were meditating offensive operations against the positions occupied by our troops in Pegue and Ava. It is said that a part of the force collected at Meyadeah was to proceed via Tongho to attack Rangoon: and it is probably with a view to guard against the enemy flanking Sir Archibald Campbell, by a movement of this kind, that the force at Rangoon was to be advanced to Pegue. The Burmans are said to be better armed, than they were found to be, when under the BUNDOOLA at Rangoon; and that the Court of Ava, so far from meditating peace, have prepared a retreat for the Royal Family in the hills to the North East of Umrapoora, should we succeed in gaining the Capital. In the mean time the Siamese still continue to shew a friendly disposition towards us, and a desire to join us. The late Chief who visited the Commanding Officer at Rangoon must feel that he has compromised his safety by the act, with such a Court as that of Ava; and it was reported at Prome, that the Officer in command of that place when taken by us, had lost his head for allowing us to capture it. It must, however, be noticed that there are letters from Rangoon, which speak of all these rumours as tales, to which no credit is to be attached; and we are not yet able to decide the question; nor likely to be until the contents of the despatches, that have arrived, be made known.

From Aracan we are sorry to hear that accounts still continue of a distressing nature. Sickness is still prevalent and casualties occurring every day among the troops. It is expected, too, that the campaign when opened will be an active one, which we apprehend can only be the case, on the supposition that the enemy are able to penetrate the mountains to attack us, or the force under General Morrison, to cross them, to join that in Ava. Every thing conspires to lead to the notion that the passage of these mountains will still be attempted from their Western side; and we trust and hope, that this great desideratum in the war will soon reward the perseverance and toils of General M.'s army.

The Colonel Young from Aracan the 23d September has arrived, but as yet we have heard of no intelligence of importance which she brings.

[John Bull, September 30.

PROME, AUG. 19.—I cannot inform you of any signs of peace with us. The Steam boat and a few small boats went up the river last week, and brought back the intelligence, that the Burmese were collecting and taking up strong positions on both sides of the river not 15 miles from this: their numbers we imagine to be about 15 thousand, some say a great many more. A few shots were exchanged, and by what I can learn, we com[illegible]ed the fire, which ought to have been the case, if it be true, that a flag of truce is on its way to us. General Cotton was on board. The European troops have not enjoyed such good health as might have been expected. The country round Prome, is delightful and must be remarkably healthy, which makes it the more singular that the men were quartered in holes, valleys, and on the banks of the river. Nature itself and the amazing large bridges which are constructed in many spots, and which except in the rains are of no use, might have suggested less objectionable places of encampment. The eminences about Prome were the proper places and infinitely less trouble and expence would have ensued. I have lately pitched my tent on one of the hills, not being particularly well. We have an abundance of provisions, capital Beef, Fowls and Vegetables. The river has fallen considerably, and as yet the monsoon has been very trifling. Should the river not rise again, I think the country would be passable in October. The Steam Boat goes down to Rangoon to-morrow.

* * * * * * * *

The Barbarians melt the Rupees as fast as they can get them, and sometimes for convenience they will divide them into several parts with their Dar, Their Dar, which is meant or acts as a large knife, is applied to all purposes, building the house, killing cattle, &c. &c. When I first came here, I seldom saw a Burmah without his Dar stuck in his girdle behind, now that they are more familiar, it is not so much exposed. I was fortunate when I arrived here in picking up a fine strong pony. I gave 100 Rupees for it to a Burmah. I doubt very much, whether I shall be able to take him to Calcutta or Madras, where it would be very valuable. We all anticipate of as great perplexities next march as in the former one; although there is an abundance of cattle, there are not many bullocks adapted for draft. Besides the Commissary seizes every thing, but not without paying 50 Rupees per pair.

RANGOON, 29TH AUGUST.—"There are 40,000 men collected about 50 miles above Prome, and in fact a good way round it, and another large body moving towards Rangoon by Jongo and Pegue, to meet which, a force is just starting, and some more to follow: Sir Archie himself is anxious to get every man he can; and in fact, we are at the eve of a general engagement of more consequence, than any we have had yet. The Burmese themselves are very numerous here now, working for us, &c. and very quiet, they are without exception I think, the finest made and most robust fellows I ever saw in my life, immense arms and legs, and stout bodied fellows; the women are inclined to be fairer than the Indians, and some rather pretty, their dresses are however very indecent, which I dare say you have heard described: the men seem very independent, and carry themselves very straight; with European discipline, and European Officers, I think they would be a match for any nation in the world; they are also strong and hardy, and by no means deficient in courage and natural skill withal; it is a thousand pities Government have not taken some steps towards arranging the revenues of the country, and making overtures to some of the Native Princes, who would with a little management very soon join us, (if we put them in possession of a district,) and furnish us with supplies; besides this would give some confidence to the natives here, who would be sure of our protection, from the king's power, and he would moreover be brought to his senses, seeing we were in earnest, and meant to keep the country we took; and he would then make peace, to save as much of his territories as he could; but at present, the native powers don't join us, because no overtures are made to them on that head, and they are afraid to desert the king, till they are certain of our protection; lest they lose their heads, and the king himself believes, we only intend to punish them and do as much mischief as we can, and then leave the country again, so he gives himself no trouble about making peace; I think however if we were to advance to Ava, plunder it as a punishment to them, and then retire to Prome, or even Rangoon, and keep possession of it, Bassein, and Arracan, and all the country between them, and then act on the defensive in a compact body, well housed and supplied, drawing revenue from the country we retained, we should do the best thing we could do; for I really think, and so do most others here, that Rangoon would be a most valuable acquisition with all the plains round it, and the teak timber a little higher up; besides if the Government at home did not sanction this, what would be easier than giving it up again; at all events I think sending proper persons round to arrange the finances of the country (even if it was only for the time) would give great confidence and encouragement to the inhabitants of the country we now possess, and be the cause of a speedy peace, or better terms than we are likely to get by other means."—Columbian Press Gazette.

[Bengal Hurk. October 1 1825.

The highly important intelligence, which we communicated in our Extra of yesterday---republished in to-day's paper---has been received with a satisfaction so general, as to place beyond doubt the unpopularity of the present war. The wish shewn, on all hands, that the Armistice entered into between Colonel TIDY, and the Burmese Chiefs at Meaday, may terminate in peace, is evidence sufficiently satisfactory, how slender are the advantages expected by any, from a prosecution of the contest. [illegible] tered into originally for the punishment of B[illegible] mese aggression, and violation of our territo[illegible] that object has already so far been gained, [illegible] the progress we have made into their coun[illegible] and the losses to which we have subject[illegible] them; and the necessary security for their [illegible] ture peaceable conduct will no doubt be [illegible] tained by the treaty, eventually to be conclud[illegible] That the terms of this treaty should be more [illegible] vourable to the Court of Ava, then the B[illegible] mese deserve, or than perhaps were once i[illegible] tended on our part, will not surprize us. C[illegible] cumstances, with which at the outset of t[illegible] war we were unacquainted, may possibly ha[illegible] shewn us, that in good policy, we ought to re[illegible] satisfied with less, than our power and positi[illegible] in the East would certainly enable us by pe[illegible] severance to attain; And that great as the ol[illegible] ject in view, in going to war with the Burmes[illegible] may have been, the sacrifices to attain it, in th[illegible] fullest manner, may be more than, after all, [illegible] is worth. In one point of view, protracted an[illegible] disappointing as the war has been, it may prov[illegible] beneficial to our power; it has taught us mor[illegible] of our South-eastern neighbours than we kne[illegible] before; and should their aggressive acts agai[illegible] rouse us to take arms, we shall probably hav[illegible] learnt a lesson from the past, how to conduct i[illegible] to a more speedy termination. We speculate[illegible] our readers will perceive, on the faith that peac[illegible] is about to be re-established, and, every thin[illegible] considered, appearances are certainly at this[illegible] moment favourable to the hopes that it will b[illegible] so. Whether the Chiefs at Meaday act unde[illegible] authority of, or in opposition to the Court o[illegible] Ava we have not heard. A letter from Prom[illegible] of the 15th September mentions indeed, that an[illegible] Ambassador had arrived from Ava at Meaday, and that it was at his request that Colonel TIDY was sent to Meaday; they add that Colonel TIDY had been received with great honour. These letters speak of both parties being inclined to come to an understanding, and we are glad to observe it mentioned that the few Englishmen at Ava were safe, although in confinement.

JEWISH SUPERSTITIONS.

The Jews have some remarkable fancies concerning their dead. They seem, indeed, to be as much distinguished from their ancestors by the childish and monstrous superstitions with which their literature is filled, as by their firm adherence to that law against which they rebelled so often before it was abrogated. So well, however, are they now persuaded of the resurrection, that the name which they give to a burial place is the House of the Living, an expression finely implying that it is the dead alone who can be said to live truly. The body, according to their notion, has a certain in-

We have continued to insert in our present number, such extracts from the latest English papers as appeared to us most interesting.

The ships Bombay Castle, Caledonia, and Gloriozo, and the H. C. brig Palinurus, have arrived from Mandavie, where the troops for field service in Cutch were disembarked. Our letters of the 12th from that place mention that every thing was quiet, and that there was no chance of any fighting.

The Gloriozo sustained some slight damage from striking on a reef of rocks near Diu. The H. C. Cruizer Amherst lost her lower yards in a squall. This ship, which has just been built, and

Extract of a Letter dated Baroda Oct. [redacted]1th—"After nearly a month of dry weather, and having almost given up hope of more rain, we have this morning had a most refreshing shower. Some slight injury is apprehended for the bajeree, which is nearly ready for the sickle, but the advantage to all the cold weather crops is incalculable. The heat during the last fortnight has been very great, and fevers prevalent, though, upon the whole, this place seems less unhealthy than the more northern stations. There is a report, though I cannot vouch for it as good authority, that the locusts have appeared in the province. They were first observed in Raj Peempla, whence they are said to have moved onwards into the Broach Districts. I hope this is only an artifice of the grain dealers to keep up the price of corn, which, in such a productive year as th s, is likely to be brought very low. The beautiful bridge which Capt. Waddington is building for His Highness the Guicowar is nearly finished, the centrings removed, and no sinking of the arch. Fourteen elephants, which came from the villages, whither they had been sent to pasture, went over the bridge on their road to the city, when sent for to swell the pageantry of the Gunputty Festival. This occurrence was of course little regarded either by Capt. W. or his friends, but it had a marvellous effect in comforting the minds of the natives, who could not look without apprehension at the airy lightness of the classic arch, so widely differing from their ideas of the solid strength requisite for such constructions. It is a most elegant specimen of English taste and English science, and interesting as a mark of His Highness's consideration for the comfort of his subjects in general, the British cantonment in particular; since, without this bridge, the communication betwixt camp and the city was difficult, and often dangerous, through the rainy months."

Mr. Hume has been as indefatigable as ever in the present session of Parliament, in prying into the supposed abuses existing in the various departments of the State. We think the unwearied efforts of the Hon'ble Gentleman, in his favourite walk of Parliamentary duty, have the most beneficial tendency, but we must confess he appears to us sometimes to overact his part. As an instance of this, he made lately no less than 36 motions in one week, on the subject of Sierra Leone, and called for an account of the proceedings at that colony for the last thirty years, which, had they been granted, we do not believe a single member of the House would have taken the trouble of looking at. Mr. William Horton, the under secretary for the colonies, on the occasion of one of these motions being made, stated that it would require four men perfectly competent to the duties of his office, and thoroughly well acquainted with the subjects, to labour for six months incessantly before they could prepare all the returns which had already been ordered in the Colonial Department. Nine-tenths of these documents must have been moved for, for the simple purpose of being laid upon the table; and we really believe that it is the everlasting call for papers on the part of the member for Montrose, and his partial examination of them afterwards, which has made him so celebrated for his mistakes in the House of Commons.

The following, from the Calcutta Government Gazette, is the most interesting and satisfactory intelligence which has been for some time received from the head quarters of our army in Ava.

"Prome.—Despatches have been received from Brigadier-General Sir ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, at Prome, dated the 7th, 14th, and 19th of September, which contain the following intelligence:

On the evening of the 6th of September, a War Boat, with a Flag of Truce, presented itself at the advanced post of the British Army on the Irawuddy, having on board a deputation, consisting of two Chiefs and twelve followers. Upon being conducted to Sir ARCHIBALD CA[redacted]s presence, they produced a letter from the Officer Commanding the Burmese Army, addressed to the Commander of the British Forces, acknowledging in polite terms, the receipt of his previous Letters; announcing that the King's youngest Brother had been fully empowered to treat; and inviting Sir ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL to make known the terms which the British Government proposed to offer. The Deputies added, that they were instructed to communicate verbally, the desire of their Government for Peace, and to enlarge on the benefits which would accrue to both Countries, from the restoration of friendship, an object which they understood the English also to be anxious to accomplish—Suitable replies having been given, the Chiefs then asked, whether Sir ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL would in return for their having been sent to the British Camp, allow two of his Officers to visit the Burman Commander, at Meaday, observing, that such a compliment would be received as a gratifying mark of confidence, and a pledge of the sincerity of his desire for Peace. To this measure Sir ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL readily assented, and selected for the mission, Lieutenant Colonel TIDY, the Deputy Adjutant General, and (at the recommendation of Captain ALEXANDER, R. N.) Lieut. SMITH, of His Majesty's Ship Alligator, with Mr. SARKIES MANOOK, as Interpreter.

The following day, a further conference took place, during which it was arranged that the Officers composing the British Mission should be empowered to conclude an Armistice for a period of 40 days, with the Burmese Commander, and settle a convenient spot for a meeting between Sir ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, and the Negociators from the Court of Ava.

Lieutenant Colonel TIDY proceeded to Meaday on the 12th, where he met with a most polite and friendly reception; and returned to Prome on the morning of the 19th of September.

The following is the substance of the Armistice concluded on the 17th of September, by Lieutenant Colonel TIDY, and Lieutenant SMITH, on the part of Sir ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, and by ATTAWNON MENJEE, MEEHA MENLA, Rajah, and the WOONDOOCK MEHA SEEREE SEN KEEYAH, duly authorized by SAHDO MENJEE MAHA MENGOON, the First Minister of the King of Ava.

1st. Cessation of hostilities from the date of the Armistice to the 17th day of October.

2d. The first Minister of the King, with full powers, will meet the British authorities fully qualified by their Government half-way between the two Armies, on the 2d of October, to enter into negociations for the re-establishment of peace and amity.

3d. A line of demarkation to be drawn between the two Armies, commencing at Comua, on the western bank of the Irawuddy, and continuing along the road to Thongo. The respective parties engaging to prevent their Troops passing the said Line, and further giving assurance that all Detachments shall be immediately recalled to their own side. No forward movement to be made by either Army before the 18th of October.

4th.—Two Officers from each army to meet on the 23d of September, to mark off the ground for the encampment of the respective Chiefs, and to make arrangements preparatory to the meeting of the Commissioners.

5th.—The State of the First Minister absolutely requiring that he shall not move without a train of 500 men with Fire Arms, and 500 with Swords, the British Commander will be attended by an equal number should he deem it expedient.

The Despatches further state, that the Troops continued healthy at Prome, and the sick returns were daily improving. At Rangoon all apprehension of an attack had subsided—the alarm appears to have had its origin in the circumstance of the Enemy having reinforced his Post at Tongho, with a body of between two and three thousand men. Measures were in progress for assembling a Force at Pegu early in the cold weather."

We have much pleasure in giving publicity to the following correspondence.

To MAJOR PEIRCE, and the Gentlemen Passengers of the Cambridge.

MY DEAR SIR,

Allow me to assure you that the letter I had the honor of receiving this morning individually and collectively expressive of my attention on the voyage, has given rise to feelings which invariably attach to those whose duties, when fulfilled, are rightly appreciated.

I still, however, sensibly feel how inadequate any exertions of mine must have proved, unaided by that truly gentlemanly conduct, harmony, and good fellowship, which has been the leading mark to the comforts to which you have been pleased to allude, and has made that which is sometimes an arduous and a difficult task, a truly pleasurable and delightful feeling,

For your kind wishes for my future welfare and prosperity, accept my heartful thanks; and with a most ardent wish that your fondest hopes may be realised, with continued health to enjoy them,

I remain, my dear Sir,
Very truly and sincerely your's,

MONODY

ON THE DEATH OF
LIEUTENANT COLONEL COMMANDANT
GEORGE BRYDGES BELLASIS.

"In the midst of the preparations for our approaching gaieties, Death has deprived us of Colonel Bellasis, the life of every party."—Extract of a private letter, dated Poonah, September 30th 1825.

Wide o'er the camp had Expectation flung,
Her rain-bow banner to the mountain air,
And wide the note of preparation rung,
Rating each fiend malignant to its lair,
While Pleasure at the sound obedient sprung,
And all was joy and exultation there!—
But on the festal morning, where was he
Who was the Sun of that festivity!

The sullen booming of the death-drum's roll,
(The soldier-requiem for a soldier's soul)
The vollied fire that o'er the closing grave
Peals the last honors to the buried brave,
Are ended now; and all the proud array
Of funeral pageantry hath passed away;
The fresh piled mound alone remains—and this
Marks the last resting-place of BELLASIS!!

Of BELLASIS, the brilliant and the gay,
The boon companion of the social day,
The war-tried warrior and the time-tried friend,
Whose spirit, Fate could neither break nor bend!
His was the wit at which the table roar'd,
His the warm heart and hospitable board,
The board that spread such welcome with its fare
That strangers felt themselves no strangers there!
His was the voice whose laugh-inspiring sound,
Flung the bright halo of enjoyment round,—
The song whose melody each list'ner won,
The jest that glanced at all and wounded none,
The genuine tale inimitably told,
The mirth whose influence like enchantment rolled,
And charm'd the young, and more than cheer'd the old!

As in the darkling brake, the fire-fly [redacted]
And sheds a mimic day where'er it str[redacted]
So, baffling melancholy's demon power,
His presence brighten'd up the gloomiest hour!
The rich out-pourings of his Fancy drew
Congenial minds to yield their treasures too,
While moodier souls were kindled at the tone
And deem'd the spirit of the mirth their own,

The sport of fortune thro' life's chequer'd scene,
He scorn'd what was, and smiled o'er what had been;
His soul a Christian's and his bosom rife
With all the kindlier charities of life;
He mingled with the crowd with playful ease,
And, pleased with others, knew the way to please,
While polish'd breeding, thro' the course he ran,
Stamp'd him in every thing the "GENTLEMAN."
